Introduction

This associational atlas is an attempt to show two diverse layers of information on one map. The first layer is a geographical representation of states and counties in the United States. Upon that layer has been added Southern Baptist state conventions and fellowships and their respective associations. Yet, these conventions, fellowships, and even more so, associations do not always follow the political boundaries of states and counties. What is more likely is that there are no clear lines of demarcation for associations. Churches that combine to form an association may often be linked more by affinity than by geography and, thus, have overlapping areas of work. Some would say that since most churches have definitive locations, it should be easy to attach associations to a set geography. Others would contend that to link associational boundaries to geographical entities is a fruitless, if not impossible task.

Decisions were made that, as closely as possible, make some geographical sense out of associations that do not follow the political boundaries of counties. Since associations are basically networks of churches, many associations claim churches that lie outside their "official" territory. Even when the boundaries of associations can be determined, there is a great likelihood that those boundaries will change. Therefore, this edition of the associational atlas is a snapshot of associations in a moment in time.

Despite the fluid nature of many associations, this associational atlas should prove useful to missions and state convention staffs. While it may be useful for local directors of missions, the primary target audiences are state convention staffs (particularly the state directors of missions) and North American Mission Board staff. Since these individuals have responsibility for state convention, and even national level missions work, the associational atlas should help them locate and retrieve key data in support of missions. These maps should prove a valuable resource for planning and data retrieval for Southern Baptist missions planners and developers throughout the Convention.

With the maps, the associational atlas includes association names and their corresponding association numbers for each state convention. These numbers are identifiers assigned by the Sunday School Board of the Southern Baptist Convention. Each number has two parts: first is the state convention code, second is the association code. These codes are a key to unlocking the historical databases of Annual Church Profile and older Uniform Church Letter information by association.

In addition to the association codes, one may use the maps to identify the counties in which an association has its primary work. Subsequently, demographic reports can be provided for those counties. The demographic reports and the associational data can be used together as powerful tools for evaluation and strategy development. For example, this data can be used to determine congregation to population, and Southern Baptist membership to population ratios.

Many persons helped with information that is contained in the associational atlas. This volume owes a great deal to the help of state directors of missions. They are most aware of the dynamics of associational change in their respective state conventions. The state directors of missions were sent maps of their convention for review and approval. The finished atlas is the result of their active involvement.

Numerous individuals in the Research Division of the Home Mission Board assisted in this project. Steve Whitten and Richie Stanley gave useful advice and encouragement throughout the project. Pam Mitchell performed an outstanding job in overall project management. Marilyn Kelley did final editing. Connie Anthony assisted in table preparation and in assembling the report. Finally, and most importantly, Carolyn Hillmon produced and reproduced maps through their many permutations throughout the project. Her expertise was essential to the production of the associational atlas.

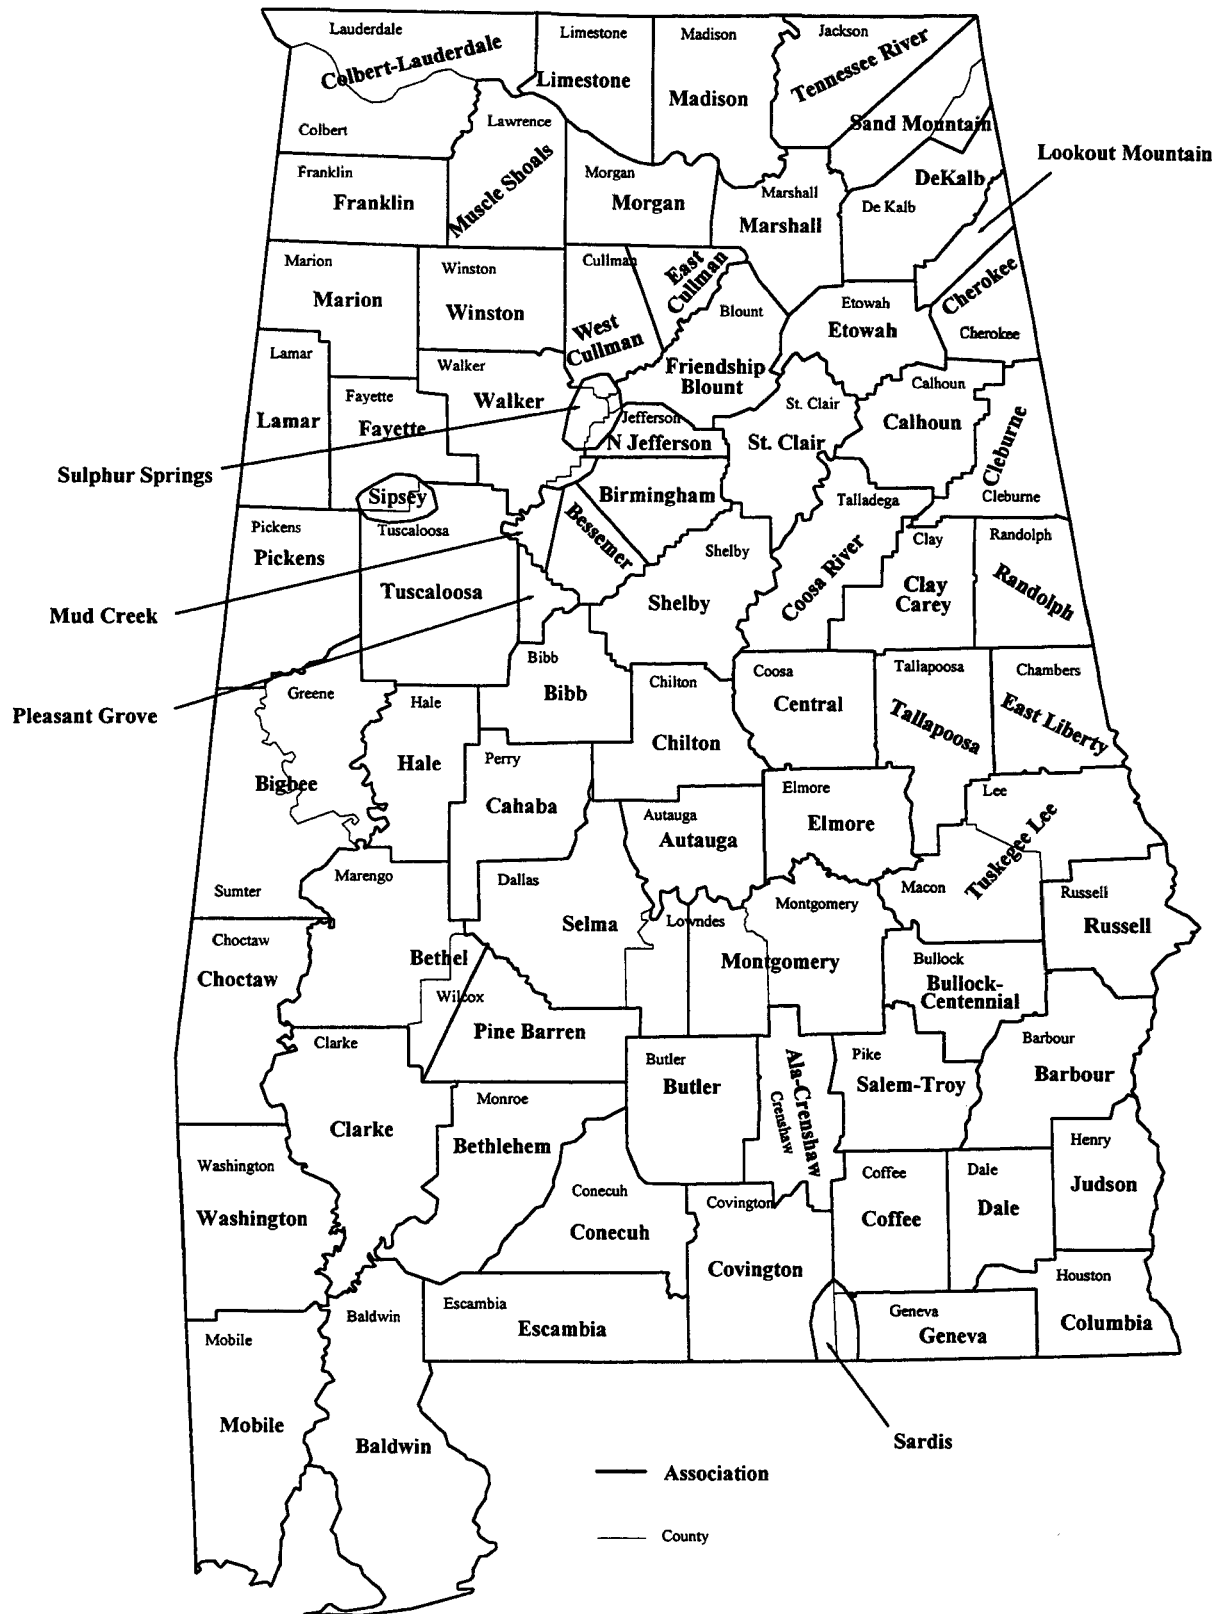

Again, it should be stated, that associations are often not geographically based. Many times their boundaries of influence may overlap. Yet, the churches that comprise these associations are serving in communities, neighborhoods, towns, cities, and counties that are geographically oriented. This associational atlas represents the most accurate snapshot of associational areas that is currently available. It is hoped this atlas will be a useful tool for mission strategists throughout our Convention as they serve to help bring our nation to Christ.
